
The Irish Regiments.

The remarks of our correspondent "Veritas" in relation to the change of the rendezvous of Colonel Sinclair's Regiment from Ann Arbor to Ypsilanti, seem to have been construed entirely different from what we believe was intended. We certainly would not have permitted the article to appear in our columns had we believed it could be construed into an attack on another regiment, instead of a defence of Col. Sinclair's from misapprehensions and misrepresentations. The field is quite large enough for not only the two Irish regiments forming, but for still another, and we know that the fire of patriotism burns warmly enough in the hearts of our Irish citizens to ensure men enough to fill both regiments. The only strife or rivalry that should exist between our regiments, is as to which shall prove itself the bravest in the field—which shall come back with the most glory. It will give us great pleasure to lend the aid of our columns to the completion of not only both these regiments, but to any others in formation, but never knowingly to the prejudice of any who are engaged in the defence of the country.
